Office Redesign

Involving everyone in redesigning the office lays the foundation for the new way of working that follows it.

Key steps

It's easier to change the context people work in than to change their behavior directly, and the office is a big part of that context.

Interview people to understand how they actually use — or would like to use — the office, find a global look and feel adapted to local nuances and branding, and focus the change on bricks, bytes and behavior together. Get everyone involved to make the move itself stress-free, then implement the design with local nuances taken into account.
